The Braes Estate, now Webb Institute, belonged to Herbert Lee Pratt, who in 1930 awaited his 54 casks of "flower-pots" from Marseilles- stored inside were 240 cases of French Champagne discovered by U.S. prohibition agents. In defense of Mr. Pratt, his lawyers said, "Mr. Pratt did just what you or I or anyone with money enough to do so and a desire to buy liquor would have done" (Time Magazine, 1930). The Pratts owned a five other estates in Glen Cove along with the Braes including the Russian Embassy, to name a couple.

While in Glen Cove, enjoy strolling in the downtown area and visit the many shops and restaurants.

Access Motor Parkway at Roslyn Road south of Barnyard Lane. In the Great Gatsby era of the 1920s bootleggers found the parkway a convenient link between their delivery points on secluded beaches and the booming liquor market of Manhattan.

During the Prohibition years, the Parkway gained a reputation as “rum runner’s road.” This is because the 45 mile parkway was privately owned and operated away from official police jurisdictions. Bootleggers found the parkway the quickest, safest distribution route between New York City and Long Island.

The 23 room Charles II –style mansion and its 160 acres of English gardens and sweeping lawns was home to Phipps, his wife and their children. The estate was the site of lavish parties in the 1920s. Scenes from the 1970 film “Love Story” and many other movies including, “The Age of Innocence” and “American Gangster” were filmed on site.
